From John Beyerle ... Perhaps the Russians won't send troops:

I just called Karasin. He agreed that the situation had gotten worse in Osh and Jalalabad today but said the Russian position is still that sending in foreign troops, whether Russian or CSTO, will be counterproductive and lead to more violence and bloodshed.

The IL-76s that flew in to Kant today were the EMERCOM/M4C planes he told me about yesterday; they have humanitarian cargo, primarily doctors and medical equipment. I cited the news reports that a battalion of paratroopers had gone in -- he said there may be some troops on board to guard the plane or beef up security at Kant, but he was firm that at this point Russia has no plans to introduce its own forces in the south. The main objective was to stop the violence through peaceful means; Russia had provided the Kyrgyz forces with additional "technical means" for accomplishing that. He said they hoped this would help Kyrgyz forces get control of the situation, which was their main goal.

I asked about CSTO planning, and possible UN or OSCE PKFs. He said there is no formal CSTO meeting planned, although people are consulting via phone. He repeated their hesitation to see any CSTO deployments. They have not yet considered UN or OSCE PKFs, but if the situation continues to deteriorate, he wouldn't exclude the possibility.

Rushailo is currently in Moscow, but may be sent to Bishkek tomorrow or Tuesday. He agreed to call me if there is any major change in the situation on the ground, or regarding force deployments. Tomorrow is a Russian holiday but he'll have his cell phone on.
